Any large expanse of glass can be a danger with potential that people will not notice it. The Building Regulations 2000 require that glass is made apparent. Failure to do this could result in costly court action if an accident did occur. On a much more positive note, glass expanses hold many marketing and design opportunities.

Whilst building regulations do dictate where and when manifestation should appear, there are no set requirements as to how it should appear. This allows for an infinite number of possibilities when deciding on a design. As long as the design chosen provides a contrast between its appearance and that of the glass, it is serving its purpose by making the glass apparent, and with a wide range of films available including digital printing, it is possible to be very creative with your installation.
